This ambitious and pioneering cross-disciplinary series seeks to explore Britain's involvement in Africa through the collection of rare or not widely available primary resources. It will be of interest to all historians working in this area and to those involved in development studies.

The series of multi-volume sets will contain material relating to every aspect of Britain's relationship with the continent and to all the countries in which Britain had a presence, including those smaller colonies and protectorates that have received comparatively little attention. Care will be taken to ensure that the documents chosen reflect change over time and illuminate the main spheres of current academic research and new and emerging subject areas. Although the perspective will be primarily Western, sources will be included that provide African views of the development process and that help to reveal the relationship between colonizers and the colonized and the impact white settlement had on African societies.

- Will republish rare or difficult-to-access material
- Documents will illuminate the development process and the relationship between colonizers and the colonized
- Will cover the main spheres of current and emerging research
- Each set will include a substantial introduction, thematic introductions, explanatory notes and a full bibliography
- Each set will have a consolidated index in the final volume
- All source material will be reset

One of the main motives for British imperialism in Africa was economic gain. This collection examines the ways in which Britain developed Africa, and, in so doing, benefited her own economy. In addition, it explores the impact development had on African societies and the economic roles of Africans. Topics examined will include: agricultural production of foods and non-foods; the marketing of produce; white settlement of farm lands; the emergence of trade, mining, industry and banking; African enterprise; and the supply of labour and working conditions.

Britain and Africa

5 Volume Set: c.2000pp: February 2012

To transport products from the interior of Africa to docks, from where they were exported, and to move imported machinery and domestic goods to towns, mines and farms within the continent, the British had to construct a sophisticated transport and communications infrastructure. This collection presents rare and difficult-to-access documents relating to the development of various forms of communication. The first four volumes will concentrate on the continent's railway system, investigating the proposed reasons for building lines, their finance and construction, the rolling stock used, and the operation and economic impact of completed works. The final volume will consider the construction of Africa's road network, river navigation, harbour construction, shipping, and the arrival of aviation and postal, telegraph and telephone services.

Financing India's Imperial Railways, 1875–1914

Stuart Sweeney

Sitting at the heart of the raj's project to 'improve' India, the construction of railways began as a 'liberal' experiment in 1853, its aims: to promote trade and commerce, to distribute food to famine-stricken regions, and to facilitate the movement of troops. Rather than being a paeon to free trade, however, the money came from taxes levied on the native tax-base who were sparsely represented politically, and financiers who held a disproportionate influence over Imperial decision-makers in London. Sweeney's monograph focuses in on what was the largest investment project of the British Empire and debunks prevailing ideas about the British Indian experience.

Women Writing Home, 1700–1920: Female Correspondence across the British Empire

General Editor: Klaus Stierstorfer

These letters 'written home' are not only straightforward historical sources; they are also representations of the state of the Empire in far-off lands sent home to Britain and, occasionally, other centres established as 'home'. The letters reveal the many different ways in which women perceived colonial society.

Organized by geographical region, the set pays close attention to the regional and local specificities of colonial situations in various parts of the British Empire: from the settler colonies of North America, Australia and New Zealand to the isolated military and administrative outposts in Asia and the complex ethnic and economic situation of South Africa.

'This extensive collection offers a treasure trove of insights into the daily lives, challenges and preoccupations of women across the British Empire.' Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History
