Studies for the Society for the Social History of Medicine

Series Editors: David Cantor and Keir Waddington

This series is concerned with all aspects of health, illness and medicine, from antiquity to the present, in all parts of the globe. Its interests include the circumstances that promote health or illness, the ways in which people experience and explain such conditions, and what, practically, they do about them.

The series is a collaboration between Pickering and Chatto and the Society for the Social History of Medicine (SSHM). The SSHM has pioneered interdisciplinary approaches to the histories of welfare, public health, demography, anthropology, sociology, social administration and health economics.

Nervous Disease in Late Eighteenth-Century Britain: The Reality of a Fashionable Disorder

Heather R Beatty

This study, based on extensive use of eighteenth-century newspapers, hospital registers and case notes, examines the experience of suffering from nervous disease – a supposedly upper-class malady.

Desperate Housewives, Neuroses and the Domestic Environment, 1945–1970

Ali Haggett

The historical association between femininity and neurosis is well documented. Many recent studies have seen women's mental health issues in the aftermath of the Second World War as being a direct consequence of a lack of opportunity and the banality of a domestic lifestyle. Although the figure of the 'desperate housewife' is familiar to us, this study suggests that many women in the 1950s and '60s led satisfying lives and that gender roles, while very different, were often seen as equal.

War and the Militarization of British Army Medicine, 1793–1830

Catherine Kelly

During the French Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars, British doctors travelled in unprecedented numbers to foreign locations where they were confronted with battlefield injuries, virulent and mysterious diseases, and complex military politics that few had encountered before. Drawing on rare manuscript sources, Kelly examines how nearly twenty-five years of sustained warfare affected the professional identity embraced by those doctors and thoroughly militarized their approach to medicine.

This study demonstrates the emergence of the 'military medical officer' and places their work within the broader context of changes to British medicine during the first half of the nineteenth century.

A Modern History of the Stomach: Gastric Illness, Medicine and British Society, 1800–1950

Ian Miller

This study is the first exploration of the complex relationship between the abdomen and modern British society. It traces the development of the management of gastric conditions by various, often competing, members of the medical profession, detailing conflict between the ideas and values of surgeons, physicians, psychologists and gastroenterologists.

Miller demonstrates how the framework of ideas and concepts established in medicine related to gastric illness often reflected wider social issues including industrialization and the impact of wartime anxiety upon the inner body.

Medicine in the Remote and Rural North, 1800–2000

Edited by J T H Connor and Stephan Curtis

This volume of thirteen essays focuses on the health and treatment of the peoples of northern Europe and North America over the course of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. 'The North' is here considered as more than simply a geographical region. It is a place of cold and hardship on the one hand and of welcome solitude and opportunity on the other – a place requiring adaption and compromise.

Locating Health: Historical and Anthropological Investigations of Place and Health

Edited by Erika Dyck and Christopher Fletcher

The essays in this collection focus on the dynamic relationship between health and place. Historical and anthropological perspectives are presented, with each discipline having a long tradition of engaging with these concepts. Through diverse examples and perspectives, the resulting contributions offer new conceptual and methodological insights, enhancing both fields.

Meat, Medicine and Human Health in the Twentieth Century

Edited by David Cantor, Christian Bonah and Matthias Dörries

This collection of ten essays explores some of the complex relations between meat and human health in twentieth-century North America and Europe. Its subjects include the relationship between the meat and the pharmaceutical industries, the slaughterhouse and the rise of endocrinology, the therapeutic benefits of meat extracts and the short-lived fate of liver ice-cream in the treatment of pernicious anaemia. Together these papers highlight a complicated array of often contradictory attitudes towards meat and human health.
